Climbing to fight dementia

Sion Jair is a 68-year-old man who moved from Birmingham to Lake District 17 years ago. He is a lifetime fan of climbing, so, when four years ago the doctors told him that he was suffering from Alzheimer's, he had no doubt that his hobby would be the best way to keep his mind active and to keep this illness under control.

Every day, he climbs the 2,634ft (804 m.) high mountain The Old Man of Coniston in The Lake District and this helps him to keep his mind active and his body fit. "It helps me to think and helps me to concentrate. When you are coming down and having to think about where you put your feet it helps."

His advice for other people suffering from Alzheimer's is, not to climb mountains, but to do something they have done before and to do it again.

Alzheimer's is the most common cause of dementia but Mr. Jair says that it has helped him to enjoy each day as it comes instead of waiting for the future. He has learned how important it is to get up every day and appreciate what you have got that day, concentrating your mind to what is happening that day.
